Q: Can a family still have a funeral service for a loved one who says, “I don’t want a service?”

A: When a loved one says, “I don’t want a service,” the family is left with the feeling that they must honour their loved one’s wishes. This may deny them a very necessary step in the grieving process. The purpose for having a funeral service, whether a traditional service or a memorial service, is to give the family the opportunity to share the memories and grief with their friends and the community. Having a service is one of the first steps towards closure for the grieving family.
